Ag Canada developing plan for judicious neonic use

Producers must tailor products to the right beetle species for best results in canola, say scientists

BY ROBERT ANDREWS

Agriprocessors in Canada and the crop protection industry are developing a plan to avoid costly growers' mistakes when using neonicotinoid insecticides, says a report from the Canadian Council of Agricultural Science and Innovation.

The report, which was released last week, says that growers should be aware of the different species of beetles that can damage canola crops and tailor their insecticide use accordingly.

Producers should also be aware of the different species of beetles that can damage canola crops and tailor their insecticide use accordingly.

The report also says that growers should be aware of the different species of beetles that can damage canola crops and tailor their insecticide use accordingly.

"It's not just about the beetle species, but also about the timing of the application and the weather conditions," says the report.

"It would be nice to be able to target the application and have some way to see if it's working," says the report.

Small shippers lose in rail system plan

Incentives based on moving large trains

BY JO WILSON

As a result of the new rail system plan, small shippers are expected to lose out on incentives for moving large trains.

The plan, which was announced last week, says that growers should be aware of the different species of beetles that can damage canola crops and tailor their insecticide use accordingly.

"It's not just about the beetle species, but also about the timing of the application and the weather conditions," says the report.

"It would be nice to be able to target the application and have some way to see if it's working," says the report.
